It's a comical time we live in. As a young adult, the ambitions from youth seem to have dulled, motivation has been replaced by the feeling that the future is bleak, and the only way things will get better is by waiting.

I boycott entropy.

*Others seems to confirm our fears. The surging pessimism of media overpowers the possibility of any hope, we think there's only so much we can do within these confines and desperately
search for ways to cope.*

WTF

It's kind of like the Stock market,

People seem to sell their stocks when they predict failure, but then again, those that hold on and don't let their emotions
take control emerge victorious,
(most of the time)

But it really is a matter of how well you can regulate your thoughts despite the emotional volatility of those around you.

5.

*I know that's harder said than done, for some people though it's kind of easy.
There are those among us that are taking advantage of the situation to capitalise and grow. Adaptability is a coveted trait in these times.*

Average Hustler

The healthcare industry has been shot, people and close relatives are dying each day, the economy is on the verge of collapse, but all I seem to care about are the mouth watering stock prices.

WTF no*

Then there are also those that are just glad things are this way, even if for just a while.

Isolation seems to have paved the way for cryptocurrency and virtual technologies to rise to prominence. The lack of any physical value to these assets hilariously contrasts how much they're actually worth. There is an exciting transformation taking place in our world and we are the frontrunners in this unexplored time of possibilities.

People are starting to find appeal in alternates to physicality, money is transforming into code and markets are shifting online. On a large scale, minimising our materialistic needs is also suppressing our impact on nature, which may compound, (a vague but hopeful prospect).

I for one truly believe we are at the initiation of a paradigm shift. This is extremely exciting to think about. People are bubbling in anticipation for virtual conveniences, and the time is as good as ever to explore what one could achieve in this myriad of opportunities.
